REVENUE FOR PENSIONS.

THE QUESTION OF DOLLARS AND CENTS UP IN THE HOUSE.

A Proposition to Change the Rules Leads to a Long Talk in Which Tariff Figures—Morrison Tells His Reform Bill Story—Durham the Economist—The Day's Work in Congress.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 23.—A proposition introduced by Morrison in the House Tuesday precipitated a debate that occupied nearly the whole session. Beginning by stating that there being no probability that another vote on the tariff bill would show any material difference in its result from that taken on Thursday last, and that therefore he would not make the motion to go into committee on the bill that he had given notice of, Morrison called attention to the amount of money required each year for the payment of pensions, and the continual increase in that amount, and stated there would be no money to pay them. He, therefore, called up a report from the committee on rules, amending the same so that a revenue provision to raise the money necessary to pay the expense can be attached to any general pension bill considered by the House.

Reed of Maine, asserted that the proposed rule would fasten upon every pension bill some method of taxation which would prove obnoxious to men who might desire a vote for the pension measure. This purpose was to make legislation upon pensions, which would defeat the measures themselves. Referring to the chances of a deficiency, he said the situation was quite liable to become such that the government would be unable to continue the payment of the public debt except by paying out a very great premium.

Randall said that the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, who reported the change of the rule, were quite unparliamentary, that there was little left for others to say in its advocacy. He conceded to the other side a full measure of patriotism in this connection, and he claimed for his side the same. He said that the rule, both individually and collectively, so far as he knew, there was no gentleman on the floor who was not ready to do entire justice to the soldier. If Congress did grant pensions, it ought to do so in a proper manner, and he would be glad to pay them. The pension bill already required $20,000,000 and this proposition merely said that it Congress added to that $20,000,000, it should at the same time provide a way of payment. That was the matter, the courageous way to do it. He appealed to the House to say that when it voted pensions it would also provide for their payment.

Mr. McKinley of Ohio thought that the proposition, if meant anything, meant that the revenues were inadequate to meet the just demands of the soldiers of the republic. If it meant that, then the conduct of certain members of the House was quite inexplicable. Within the last two days an effort had been made on the part of the majority of the leading committee of the House to reduce the revenue of the government $25,000,000, and immediately after the failure of that committee even to have accorded to it the courtesy of a consideration of its measure, the chairman of that committee, acting as a member of the committee on rules, came in with a proposition which was a confession that the government had not enough revenue in the treasury—that it would not have within the next twelve months to meet the honest and just demands of the soldiers of the republic. The government had not revenue enough to meet those demands, in God's name what did gentlemen want to reduce the revenue $25,000,000. Not only that, but if the newspapers' reports could be believed, Randall, who seemed on this occasion, at least, to be in harmony with his party himself had a bill which was about to introduce into the House, reducing internal taxation $30,000,000 and tariff taxes about $40,000,000. Yet these two leading gentlemen, each proposing to reduce the annual income of the government, came in here and said, "We have enough money enough to pay our pensioners, and if you intend to give them pensions, you must provide a way to get the money." That was not fair, that was not manly, that was not honest.
